Helmet-mounted imager

This helmet-mounted infrared imaging system allows the user to see through black smoke and total darkness. The CairnsIRIS is a hands-free system that allows full maneuverability even while crawling. The unit won't white out in a fire and will last significantly longer than the older, tube-based imagers, according to the manufacturer. Cairns & Brother Inc., Clifton, N.J.

Integrated PASS device

Designed for integration with the manufacturer's Air-Pak 2.2/4.5 SCBA, the Pak-Alert™ 1000 distress alarm is activated when the cylinder valve is opened. The system goes into alarm mode when the wearer remains motionless for about 30 seconds. When the alarm is activated, a flashing red LED appears on a chest-level console, and an alarm is generated at 95-100db for over five hours. Scott Health & Safety, Monroe, N.C.

Thermal imager

This handheld thermal-imaging camera gives firefighters a wide field of vision through smoke and darkness, helping them to locate objects. The ergonomic design features an angled viewfinder that helps prevent neck strain and accommodates a variety of user positions. Constructed with temperature-resistant polycarbonate to help withstand expected levels of heat, shock and water, the camera has a flame-retardant visor that integrates with the manufacturer's facepieces. Mine Safety Appliances Co., Pittsburgh.

Heat-sensing video camera

Constructed of Kevlar-reinforced GRP composite, the Vision-2 thermal-imaging system uses new solid-state BST technology that offers picture resolution up to 800% better than current technology, according to the manufacturer. The unit is available with an optional video transmitter that allows incident command to view the images from a remote monitor. International Safety Instruments Inc., Lawrenceville, Ga. FC
